Settler violence against Palestinians on the West Bank.

In 1981, the Israeli government established the Karp Commission, which investigated settler violence against Palestinians. The commission's findings revealed widespread violence and a failure by the Israeli government to address the issue.

The Karp Report, published in 1983, documented instances of settler violence and called for government action to stop the violence. However, subsequent reports have shown that settler violence continued, with incidents spreading to other areas of the West Bank.

In the 1990s, the Oslo Accords transferred some control over the West Bank to Palestinian authority. Despite this, settler violence persisted, with frequent incidents of violence against Palestinians and their property.

The Israeli government has struggled to address settler violence effectively. In response, various reports and studies have been conducted to explore the phenomenon and its impact on Palestinian society.

In conclusion, settler violence continues to be a significant issue in the West Bank, with an ongoing cycle of violence and resultant human rights violations. The Israeli government and international community must address this issue with urgency to ensure peace and security for all inhabitants.